The Power of a 1913 Indian Head Cent

The 1913 Indian Head $2.50 Gold Coin, also known as the Quarter Eagle, is a fascinating piece of American numismatic history. Here are some key points about its significance and value:

Key Points

1. Historical Significance: The 1913 Indian Head $2.50 Gold Coin is part of a series designed by Bela Lyon Pratt. The incuse design, where the images are sunken into the coin rather than raised, was unique and controversial at the time.

2. Mintage and Rarity: With a mintage of 722,165, the 1913 Indian Head $2.50 Gold Coin was one of the more common issues in the series. However, many of these coins were melted down in the 20th century, making them rarer today.

3. Design and Features: The obverse features a Native American chief in full headdress, while the reverse depicts a bald eagle. The coin is composed of 90% gold and 10% copper, with a diameter of 18 mm and a weight of 4.18 grams.

4. Value: The value of a 1913 Indian Head $2.50 Gold Coin can vary significantly based on its condition. Coins in average condition are worth around $615, while those in uncirculated condition can be worth between $694 and $1,252. Proof coins can be worth even more, with some valued at over $15,000.
